

Arab Reform Initiative

Research Paper, 31 July 2019

Assessing Decentralization Experiences in the MENA: Lessons Learned for Post-Conflict Countries

→ Chiara Ayad

© Arab Reform Initiative

Arab Reform Initiative

A commonality between Arab countries of the Arab Spring prior to the uprisings is that their authoritarian governments had practised heavily centralized governance, which resulted in the denial of participatory practice and citizenship rights and the concentration of power and resources in an undemocratic central state, leading to unequal development across the country. In countries under conflict where the central state's legitimacy and control are challenged, local authorities often replace the state's efforts by filling in the vacuum in security and service provision like in the case of Syrian local councils during the Syrian civil war or local security forces in Iraq. However, in countries transitioning out of conflict, to what extent can we expect local governance and decentralization reforms to bolster participative and good governance when the nature of the central state remains authoritarian and rejects real transfer of power?

For decades, decentralization as a governance reform has been at the top of the agendas international development organizations such as the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), that have channelled resources into local governance and promoted local capacity building and training. Decentralization is also generally viewed as a conflict resolution and conflict management tool because it establishes mechanisms for power sharing between competing local communities with ethnic and religious differences and enables the political representation of citizens at a local level.

In contrast, deep centralization of political and administrative powers, combined with corruption and a lack of vertical trust, often prevents local communities from contributing to critical planning and management decisions related to development efforts in their localities. It may also prevent citizens from direct political engagement connecting them to local representatives, who often have legitimacy and local knowledge to represent localities and their grievances. Such conditions of deeply centralized states can often lead to conflict between various groups and further deepen state-society divides that manifest into revolutions and, in some cases, like in the case of Syria and Yemen, escalate into violent war. This is why inclusive dialogues on forms and structures of representative and participatory governance are key to transitional processes in post-conflict and post-revolutionary contexts.

During conflict, local authorities are often empowered by both increased grassroots legitimacy and external foreign support. But in the post-conflict period, redistribution of power through constitutional reforms such as decentralization or deconcentration is a prerequisite for stabilization and conflict resolution. However, to ensure the development of governance models that can have a positive impact and lead to sustainable peace and development, lessons learned from countries where governance reforms – such as decentralization – have been adopted reveal that certain conditions need to be in place, in addition to an understanding of the technicalities of institutional design and implementation of these processes.

Arab Reform Initiative

Such conditions include inclusivity of decision making and engagement, distribution of fiscal powers and resources, strong constitutional foundations and strong central democratic institutions that respect the rule of law. The papers that form this series on decentralization will discuss the motivations, processes of institutional design and implementation of decentralization reforms as well as challenges and risks in countries that have adopted decentralization models. They provide a comprehensive view on the legal basis and political context for decentralization in Iraq, Tunisia and Morocco. The final paper will then discuss lessons learned from these processes for potential decentralization in post-conflict Syria.

According to Cheema and Rondinelli, the concept of decentralization evolved in the 1980s from deconcentration, the devolution of power within central-state structures and branches, to decentralization, a constitutional power-sharing arrangement that transfers administrative, fiscal and political powers to local and regional authorities and structures. The evolution of the concept is related to reforms that aim to increase local autonomy from the central state, decentralize central powers and expand local and regional administrative, political and fiscal powers rather than deconcentrate them within central structures.¹

An important element of governance reforms such as deconcentration and decentralization is their sequencing depending on certain contexts and needs. For example, in post-conflict contexts, since rebuilding democratic state institutions is a priority, scholars have argued that deconcentrating power must be prioritized prior to decentralization taking place. Moreover, as discussed in the cases of Morocco and Tunisia, both governance reforms of decentralization and deconcentration can be implemented in parallel, often reinforcing a system of central state guardianship “tutelle”. On the one hand, this may seem to play a role in restricting the autonomy of local decentralized authorities as they operate under strong central administrative control. On the other, as the Morocco paper argues, the operationalization of decentralization reforms is deeply linked to deconcentration reforms and can be considered as a first step towards ensuring long-term effective decentralization.

Arab Reform Initiative

Further, the distinction between the various kinds of powers that can be transferred and their sequencing, i.e administrative, political and fiscal, is key for governance reforms to have their desired impact and to evaluate the success of such processes. As most decentralization processes in the Arab world are ones of administrative decentralization, such as Lebanon and Jordan, the lack of revenue-raising mandates to accompany administrative mandates remains a key challenge and often renders local authorities dependent on budget allocations from the central state. However, as the case of Iraq shows, even if local authorities have been allocated fiscal powers and large budgets, the lack of technical skills and competencies at the local level can hinder effective administrative decentralization.

Another distinction relates to the significance and feasibility of decentralization reforms depending on whether the nature of the state is federal or unitary. The case studies presented in this series include two unitary states, Tunisia and Morocco, and one federal state, Iraq. According to Haugh and Schou, both federal and unitary states can adopt decentralization reforms; the difference is that decentralization is codified in the constitution of a federal state and the government cannot unilaterally recentralize or revoke local powers. They argue that in federal states the rights and powers of local authorities are constitutionally guaranteed and cannot be revoked through legislation. This is not the case in unitary states where degrees of decentralization are adopted and can be reversed, as in the case of Tunisia and Morocco. When decentralization is adopted in unitary states, the state and its political elites often fear it could reinforce separatist inclinations, thus the state pursues efforts of national integration and mechanisms for central oversight and control while allocating limited autonomy to local structures.²

Arab Reform Initiative

Ultimately, using the tool of decentralization to achieve participative good governance and effective service provision requires an inclusive process involving both political elites and civil society in deciding on the shape and structure of their governance, and assisting in the design and operationalization of the decentralization process. In other words, a democratic system must be in place. However, as the series of papers in this research dossier demonstrate, the risk of non-inclusive processes and elusive principles is that the decision to decentralize governance is often top-down; leading to local elite-recapture in favour of continued central state control or a decentralization of blame due to failing central government policies. A case study example that will be discussed in detail is the case of Iraq. The author argues that the rollout of the decentralization process and the lack of clarity in decentralized mandates was used by national elites as a diversion in response to public disquiet, thus shifting the blame to local authorities.

Evaluating the success of decentralization models in the Arab world is challenging. Most cases discussed have had lengthy processes of codification and amendment of several laws related to the implementation of the process. Thus, the effectiveness and benefits of their implementation are largely yet to be seen. Effective decentralization as in the case of some western countries - Switzerland is a case in point - has resulted from long term processes that require a set of pre-conditions, most notably strong democratic systems and institutions that respect the rule of law. Nonetheless, in the Tunisia case, certain aspects of the reforms have been successful particularly those pertaining to the densification of the local tools of participatory democracy such as increased youth, women and minority engagement in decentralization processes such as local elections.

In the case of post-conflict situations, the author argues that due to the diversity of Syrian society, the lack of trust in the authoritarian central state and separatist inclinations of the Kurdish community, a decentralization process would indeed be beneficial to enshrine good governance. However, the democratic reform of the central state must take place prior to the development of a sustainable model for decentralization. Thus, suggested political and administrative mechanisms for the transfer and decentralization of power in Syria, such as local elections, would need to take place within the framework of a democratic system and require the support of a democratic central state. Furthermore, since rebuilding strong central democratic institutions is a key prerequisite for a successful decentralization in post-conflict contexts, the author calls for a process of democratic decentralization for Syria based on the principle of equality for all citizens where the constitution enshrines equal civil, political and social rights for all. More broadly, due to the fragile nature of social cohesion in post-conflict societies and the lack of vertical trust in state institutions, a renegotiation of the social contract and relations between Syrian citizens and the state must, according to the author, take place in parallel to democratization efforts.

Arab Reform Initiative

Endnotes

1. Cheema, G. Shabbir & Dennis A. Rondinelli. "From Government Decentralization to Decentralized Governance" Decentralizing Governance Emerging Concepts and Practices, Washington, Brookings Institution Press, 2007.
2. Arild Schou and Marit Haug. Decentralisation in Conflict and Post-Conflict Situations. Oslo, NIBR Working Paper, 2005.

About the author

Chiara Ayad

Chiara Ayad is a project coordinator at the Norwegian Center for Conflict Resolution. Until July 2019, she was a Researcher and Programme Officer at ARI, in charge of coordinating the project on Decentralization as well as research on Gender dynamics in radicalization and Countering Violent Extremism (CVE). She holds a Master's degree in International Security from Sciences Po Paris, the Paris School of International Affairs (PSIA) and an undergraduate degree in Middle Eastern Studies from Sciences Po Menton and the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS), University of London.

About Arab Reform Initiative

The Arab Reform Initiative is the leading independent Arab think tank working with expert partners in the Middle East and North Africa and beyond to articulate a home-grown agenda for democratic change. It conducts research and policy analysis and provides a platform for inspirational voices based on the principles of diversity, impartiality and social justice.

- We produce original research informed by local experiences and partner with institutions to achieve impact across the Arab world and globally
- We empower individuals and institutions to develop their own concept of policy solutions
- We mobilize stakeholders to build coalitions for positive change

Our aim is to see vibrant democratic societies emerge and grow in the region.

Founded in 2005, the Arab Reform Initiative is governed by a Plenary of its members and an Executive Committee.

arab-reform.net

contact@arab-reform.net

© 2019 by the Arab Reform Initiative.
To view a copy of this licence, click here